Preface

In modern time which is surrounded with unpredictable complexities, interdependence and shifts, the inter-relation between law, management and society have become important than before. These organs have become increasingly and substantially entangled in the contemporary world which has been rapidly becoming more dynamic and interconnected. All these disciplines which were separate earlier are now becoming receptive and interlinked.

This book, Law, Management and Society: A Multidisciplinary Approach, comes as a result of the understanding the nature of the multi-faceted questions of today's organizations and society's problem which cannot be answered by only one discipline. This book attempts to provide depth and expanse to scholars, students, practitioners as well as policy-makers by incorporating views on law, business management, sociology, as well as ethics.

It is designed to meet the dire necessity to comprehend how the legal concepts do affect organization behavior and the development of the society, as well as how the organization management approaches comply with the contemporary evolution of the legal and ethical issues. The current society is experiencing too fast changes, this includes the introduction of artificial intelligence, technological changes, the issue of data privacy, global activities, and corporate governance. All these developments introduce dilemmas and administrative issues at the legal front that cannot exist within a vacuum, hence a multidisciplinary look is necessary. The book combines the ideas of legal scholars, management experts and social philosophers to provide balanced and comprehensive view of issues that are defining the contemporary world.

The major fields covered in the chapters are corporate responsibility, regulatory structures, digital privacy rights, labor relations, and social justice are a true reflection of the necessity of legal and managerial synergy at this stage. The book is created to meet the interest of students, academicians, legal practitioners as well as management professionals interested in linking the academic or theory to the practice. It will promote important things as critical thinking, discussion, and decisions based on information, and these are crucial when one tries to deal with the peculiarities of a society with laws and, at the same time with a leadership. Our opinion is that the work will provide the readers with an incentive to perceive the importance of cross-ecumenical approaches in forming an efficient, sustainable, and just model of societal structure.

The book has a broad audience. It provides a multidisciplinary insight that stimulates critical thinking and cognitive flexibility in the area of law, business, and social science academicians and professionals. To those involved in law, management and government service, it may present relevant information on a foundation of scholarly excellence.

The issues our world faces have become too complex to consider them in the fields of purely traditional academic disciplines, such as climate change, inequality, corporate accountability, digital transformation, democratic erosion to name only them. They require an integrated thinking, collaborative solutions and an openness to new paradigm. 'Law, Management and Society: A Multidisciplinary Approach' is a small and considered effort in that direction.

The work in this book is a result of collaboration, conversation and mutual investigation. We owe a large debt to the numerous contributors who joined this book with their own special vantage points and made the book all the better beyond the value of reckoning. A special acknowledgement to our editorial team who were quite patient, analytical and committed to quality on all occasions.
